been hitherto tolerably well met in the long run by the expensive provisions of the law. It has not been shown that in any considerable number of electorates the population steadily decreasing. The evil has not been very great.

Another argument was that under the present system certain electorates obtain increased representation, not by the will of the people, but through the action of roll-collectors, returning officers, and the Government. This is a remarkable misapprehension. Was the Electoral Act passed by collectors, returning officers, and the Government? It was as much passed by the will of the people as any special bill for increasing or reducing the representation of any separate electorate or group of electorates could be. The increase that takes place under the present system takes place in fulfillment of the expressed will of the people, which collectors, returning officers, and the Government simply carry into effect. The will of the people cannot be brought into operation without some agency; and the agencies employed in this matter are the agencies employed and trusted to in the general working of the electoral system. If, as under the old system, anomalies in the representation were left to grow until they were intolerable, and were then cured by special legislation, reliance would still have to be placed upon the action of the same agencies, for Parliament would be guided in a greater or smaller degree by returns prepared by the Government and its officers. The difference under the new system is that the returns are for the influence of caprice or favouritism, and delays by accident are precluded. All sorts of causes may interfere to prevent the passing or even the introduction of a redistribution bill, even as the need for one may be; and even when such a bill has been introduced there is no sure guarantee that every electorate shall have fair play. But under the new system, the steady growth of population in every electorate brings with it a proportionate increase in the share of the representation, as by the operation of a natural law, which neither changes of Ministries, the exigencies of party, nor the pressure of business can arrest.

Mr. Smith came nearer to the mark when he contended that the new system would have the effect of unduly increasing the number of members. There is something in that, although the hon. member seemed to miss the point of the argument. Granting that the proportion of members to population is, as he says, far greater than the proportion in Victoria, what does that prove? Are all our standards across the Murray? The inference from the fact may be that Victoria ought to level up, not that we should level down. But, says Mr. Smith, the greater the number of members the more the talk, and the smaller the return of legislative business. If that doctrine were true, there should be very little talk indeed done in the House of Commons. The fact, however, is that the measure of progress, time-consuming talk depends less upon the number of members than upon their character. Except on special occasions, such as the second reading of the Land Bill, when almost every member seemed to consider himself bound to make a speech, the talking that consumes time is done by less than a score of members. It is not distributed evenly over the whole body. There might, therefore, be as much talk as there is now, and as much time might be consumed by it, in a house of fifty members. It would hardly be incorrect to say that even though we have more than a hundred members in the Assembly, the consumption of time, without corresponding benefit, might be charged against a dozen or thereabouts. The real danger is that if the process of increasing the number of members is to go on uninterruptedly at the rate provided by the present law, the standard of membership will be lowered. It is possible in a busy, struggling, money-making community like this, to overlook and go beyond its power to supply competent and trustworthy legislators. When a certain number of members must be procured, without regard to the question whether they will or will not come forward, there is a risk of filling up vacancies in an undesirable way, if the number be too large.

We have quite enough members in the Assembly now, and any considerable increase in the number might overtake the available (though not the actual) resources of the community. The public interest, therefore, it would be well that something should be done to check such an increase. But the embarrassment of the position in which the colony now finds itself is not proof that the self-adjusting principle of the electoral law is a bad one. It is evidence, rather, that the principle was applied without sufficient care and forecast. In introducing such a principle, a start should have been made with a smaller proportion of members to electors, and a larger increase in the number of electors should have been required as the condition entitling any electorate to a larger share in the representation. By such means the number of members in the Assembly would have been kept down until the progress of settlement, and the steady development of permanent interests had enabled the community to afford the luxury of a large House with a greater degree of safety.

The question as to where the new Art Gallery should be placed is just now awaiting decision. The new gallery is wanted as long before as it is needed. The old one was simply built for a temporary purpose. It was built together in a very great hurry, and, being specifically for the pictures of the International Exhibition, was necessarily placed as close to the main building as possible. As matters turned out, it is very fortunate that a special building was resolved upon. The original idea was to utilize the galleries of the main building, and it was only because the foreign commissioners protested that the cost of a separate structure was, relatively, acquiesced in. Had the pictures, however, been displayed in the main building, our own would have remained there for the simple reason that there would have been nowhere else to put them, and they would have saved the cost of the temporary building by saving the pictures from destruction. As a permanent structure, however, it is clearly unsuitable. The risk of fire is too great, and in summer the heat is too great. We have a right to expect that the number of electors in every electorate will increase in the future, and that the number of members will increase in the future. We have a right to expect that the number of electors in every electorate will increase in the future, and that the number of members will increase in the future.

A new gallery, therefore, being a necessity, where shall it be placed? It ought to be easily accessible, on or near some line of communication, and it should be a place where the public could see the pictures with ease and comfort. The question as to where the new Art Gallery should be placed is just now awaiting decision. The new gallery is wanted as long before as it is needed.
